

GMP equalisation – what is it all about?

As a BTPS member, you have what's called a 'defined benefit' pension. This means, when you retire, this pension gives you an income for the rest of your life.

This kind of pension can be made up of different parts that you build up over your working life. The value of each part will depend on when you were employed and the pension rules at that time.

If you were a member of the Scheme between April 1978 and April 1997, one part of your pension is called 'Guaranteed Minimum Pension', or GMP for short. In most cases, GMP is only a small part of someone's pension.

What is GMP?

GMP is a minimum level of pension built up between April 1978 and April 1997. It was introduced to protect the pension rights of members in defined benefit pension schemes that, like BTPS, were 'contracted out' of the Additional State Pension (also known as the State Earnings-Related Pension Scheme, or SERPS). GMP was only built up by members of pension schemes that contracted out.

If it applies to you, the GMP is the minimum level of pension you're entitled to from BTPS. It's based broadly on the amount of Additional State Pension you would have had if you'd been 'contracted in'. GMP normally applies at 60 if you're a woman, and 65 if you're a man, regardless of your State Pension age.

Why does GMP differ for men and women?

The rules for how GMP built up were based on the way the State Pension worked at that time, with different State Pension ages for men and women.

In the past, women got their State Pension earlier than men. As a result, men and women could build up different amounts of GMP, even if they worked for the same period of time on the same pay. Sometimes this could mean a man is better off, and sometimes it could mean a woman is better off.

What does 'GMP equalisation' mean?

As a result of a High Court ruling, like all pension schemes, we have to check that men and women are being treated equally in our scheme.

To do this, we will work out how much GMP you would have built up if you were the opposite sex. If this would have resulted in a higher overall pension, you could be due a slightly higher pension now. If it would have resulted in a lower overall pension, there will be no change to your pension.

Does this affect everyone in the Scheme?

No. The legal change only applies to GMP built up between 17 May 1990 and 5 April 1997. If you don't have GMP, or you stopped building up GMP before 17 May 1990, you will not be affected.

In addition, only certain members in Section C of the Scheme are affected. If you are in Section A or Section B, you will already be receiving, or due to receive, benefits on an equalised basis, so your pension will remain unchanged.

If you are in Section C, there's nothing you need to do while we carry out our checks. If you are affected, we'll be in touch directly to let you know.

Why is this happening now?

From 17 May 1990, pension schemes legally had to calculate workplace pensions the same way for men and women. However, this didn't apply to GMP.

In 2018 the High Court ruled that GMP should have been included in the 1990 changes. This is why these GMP checks are only happening now, and why they only apply to people who built up GMP after 17 May 1990.

Checking GMP for all affected members of a scheme involves a great deal of work. That work includes running through the scheme's historical data back to 1990, working with specialist advisers, recalculating benefits, and tracking down members who have left the scheme.

As a result, it can take a few years for a scheme to finish this exercise. Members in the same scheme might get communications about GMP at different times. Also, different pension schemes are at different stages of this process. So, members in more than one scheme might hear from each scheme at different times.

Could my BTPS pension go down as a result of this?

No. Your BTPS pension will either go up or stay the same. No one will see the overall value of their pension go down.

This only affects certain members in Section C. We will work out how much GMP you would have built up if you were the opposite sex. If this would have resulted in a higher overall pension, you could be due a slightly higher pension now, or a small one-off back payment. If it would have resulted in a lower overall pension, there will be no change to your pension.

If you haven't started getting your pension yet, we will ensure your GMP amount is equalised when you come to retire. Pension quotes produced since September 2023 will be based on equalised GMP.

Does this affect spouse or civil partner pensions?

If you are receiving a spouse or civil partner's pension, it is based on the original member's pension. If they were in Section C and their pension included GMP, we need to work out how much GMP they would have built up if they were the opposite sex. If this would have resulted in a higher overall pension for them, we will increase your pension accordingly. If it would have resulted in a lower overall pension, there will be no change to the pension you're getting.

There's nothing you need to do while we carry out our checks. If your pension is affected, we'll be in touch to let you know.

An increased pension or one-off back payment could affect your tax or benefits

Although most payments will be minimal, there's a chance that an increase to your pension affects benefits you're getting, such as Pension Credit. Also, if your current pension puts you very close to a higher income tax band, an increase might push you into paying a higher rate of tax on the extra income.

If you're due a one-off back payment for any extra pension you should have got in the past, this is treated as income and so you are likely to pay tax on it. If you have any questions or concerns about tax, you should contact HMRC or speak to a financial adviser. If you are due a payment, we'll provide details for HMRC when we write to you.

What action do I need to take?

There is nothing you need to do while we carry out our checks. Remember, if you are in Section A or Section B, you are not impacted by this. If you are in Section C and impacted by GMP equalisation, we'll be in touch directly to let you know. In reality, any additional money owed is likely to be small, or negligible, in almost every case.
